APPENDIX.

The Governor-General's Proceedings, 1st November 1774 to 20th February 1781.

The various Committees and Boards of Revenue which were established in Bengal by the Company's representatives during the last quarter of the eighteenth century are confusing, and this confusion is a reflection of the difficulty and perplexity which the problem of a satisfactory and efficient collection of the land revenue caused to the Company's officers in Bengal.

The first of these committees was the Comptrolling Committee of Revenue which was formed by the orders received from the Court of Directors in England. Its proceedings commenced on April 1st, 1771, and ended on October 10th, 1772. During this period it carried out the administrative functions of Government in the Revenue Department. On October 13th, 1772, it was superseded by the Council of Revenue, generally called "the Board." This was a Committee consisting of the whole of the Governor's Council sitting as a Committee under the presidency of the Governor himself. Its proceedings commence on October 13th, 1772, and end on December 31st, 1774. In 1773, however, the Regulating Act (13 Geo. iii., cap. LXIII) was passed, reconstituting the Executive Government of the Company's territories in India. The changes involved the translation of the Governor of Bengal into the Governor-General of the Company's possessions in India, assisted by four Councillors. This Council became, as its predecessor had done, a Committee for controlling and administering the collection of the land revenue: it inherited the generic title of "the Board," and its proceedings from 1775 until 1781 are recorded as "the proceedings of the Governor-General in Council, Revenue Department." But although the Governor-General's proceedings commence from January 1st, 1775, the new Council, as reconstituted by the Regulating Act, actually met for the first time on November 1st, 1774, with Warren Hastings in the chair, as Governor-General, and General Clavering, Colonel G. Monson, Messrs Richard Barwell and Philip Francis as members.

The proceedings of the Revenue Board, therefore, from November 1st, 1774, to December 31st, 1774, really belong to the Governor-General's proceedings, and students examining the works of the Governor-General's Council should turn first to the Revenue Board proceedings, of November 1st, 1774, and not to the Governor-General's proceedings of January 1st, 1775.

The importance of these proceedings as original material for students of the history of the British rule in India has not perhaps been sufficiently recognised. The great problem that confronted the Company from the day that it accepted the Diwani and "stood forth as Diwan" was the collection of the land revenue in India. The state, as represented by the Mogul Empire, had always claimed a share in the produce of the land; the Company in 1765 had by an Imperial firman been appointed the Emperor's agent to collect this share, which in course of time passed to itself as the Mogul Empire broke up, and the great subahs became independent.

On the methods adopted by the Company in 1772, (which Warren Hastings explained to his new colleagues on November 1st, 1774) to collect the land revenue of Bengal has been built up the whole of the present district administration of India. The Commissioner at the head of his Division is the lineal descendant of the Chief of each of the six Provincial Councils, who, aided by his colleagues, administered his Division. The minor commands of a division still retain their name as districts, and in Bengal and Madras the district is still administered by a Collector. No student of the structure of the British raj in India can, therefore, omit to study the original documents containing the records of those who laid the foundations of that structure, and among the most important of those documents are the proceedings of the Governor-General in Council from 1775 to 1781.

To those who find the records of early revenue history distasteful, these proceedings will be irksome reading. The difficulties of the Persian revenue terms which do not admit of translation add to the tediousness of a very lengthy narrative. If the student is content to break through this formidable crust, he will find a mine of information, and some engaging sidelights on life in India in those days. Incidentally, the proceedings have some bearing on the controversy over the authorship of the letters of Junius. Sir Philip Francis attended the Council meetings for six consecutive years. At a very early date he became hostile to Hastings whom he hoped to supplant. He has left many lengthy and unfriendly minutes on record; most of them are tediously ineffective and contain nothing of the brilliant, ferocious invective which made Junius so famous. Is it likely that Francis would have curbed his pen and written such tiresome minutes if he could have lashed his enemy with the vigour and bitterness used by Junius? Surely here are grounds for strong presumption that Francis did not write the letters of Junius, or the proceedings of the Governor-General in Council in the Revenue Department would have been adorned with passages that might have been classical examples of invective in English.

The quarrels of this Council are famous, and the proceedings contain much evidence of this fact. The Governor-General frequently dissolved the Council for attempting as a Board to sit in judgment on the conduct of their own Governor and President.* There were faults on both sides; Francis was undoubtedly a malignant self-seeker, but General Clavering and Colonel Monson were honourable men with a high sense of duty, immeasurably superior in character to Richard Barwell, the Governor-General's supporter. Students of English literature will find references to Thackeray, the grandfather of the novelist, while those who have read Hickey's Memoirs and the account given by him of the roystering Bob Potts will not be surprised to find in the minutes obsequious letters from Mr. Potts to the Board stating that he could not live on his pay. In 1778 war with France broke out and those responsible for the Company's administration in India knew that they had their backs to the wall. The rebellion in America, the adherence of Spain and Holland to France, the armed Neutrality of the North left England powerless to send reinforcements to India: she was fighting for her existence as a Great Power. We find little or no reference to this in the proceedings, except in so far as the capture of French and Dutch territory affected the revenue of the Company.

The high standard of ability which the best of the Company's Officers reached is exemplified in the Amini Report† submitted to the Board in March 1778 and entered in the proceedings for April 3rd, 1778, as "the Aumeeny letter"—a document of first rate importance, and well worth careful study. It was compiled by Messrs. David Anderson, Charles Croftes and George Bogle. In 1776 Colonel Monson died and in 1777 General Clavering followed him to the grave. Both lie in Park Street cemetery. After Clavering's death Hastings regained his position as undisputed master of the Company's territories. The perusal of the proceedings confirms one's admiration for this great man's inflexible courage, indomitable patience, and unswerving loyalty to duty. It is easy to criticise his revenue policy, which is open to serious objection, but the weekly records of six years contained in these proceedings which, as Hastings himself recorded, "few except ourselves will ever read" reveal the character of one who was rightly named "the Great Pro-consul," who earned the respect of all who served him, the fear of all who crossed his path and the affectionate devotion of almost every Indian with whom he came in contact.
